

BUSINESS/EDUCATION

The Education Project Launches to Provide Practical Solutions for Global Education

August 05, 2009

A new annual event designed to improve the quality of education across the world, from pre-school to higher education, will launch this October in Bahrain. The Education Project aims to identify practical solutions and gain commitment from educational professionals to put them in place.

Despite the priority that governments worldwide have placed on education, and the huge investments made, concrete outcomes and significant improvements remain elusive.

"It is barely ten years since small groups of highly-motivated academics and scientists had to get together in small groups, alone and unheard, to call for greater interest in global warming and green solutions," said Professor Ralph Tabberer, Chief Schools Officer, GEMS, one of the keynote speakers. "Now, there is no world leader who dares ignore the issues. We need to make the same transformation in our thinking about education. Let us debate not just where education needs to go, but how we put this top of the agenda for every government, worldwide."

"Even our 'best' schools are failing to prepare students for 21st-century careers and citizenship," said Tony Wagner, Co-Director of the Change Leadership Group at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. "It's time to hold ourselves and all of our students to a new and higher standard of rigour, defined according to 21st-century criteria. It's time for the teaching profession to advocate for accountability systems that will enable us to teach and test the skills that matter most. Our students' futures are at stake." The Education Project was initiated by H.H. Shaikh Salman bin Hamad Al-Khalifa, The Crown Prince of Bahrain and Chairman of the Bahrain Economic Development Board.

"Sustainable economic growth that provides opportunity for all is only achievable with the right education system in place," said Shaikh Mohammed bin Essa Al Khalifa, Chief Executive of the Bahrain Economic Development Board. "That means education is one of the biggest challenges facing the world today. Different countries face different challenges but many of the issues are common. Bahrain has a strong track record in education and much to share with the world. But we have much to learn too. Our goal in establishing the Education Project is not only to share best practice but to create a practical road map that educators around the world can follow in order to improve outcomes."

Bahrain has long had a successful track record in education - it was the first country in Middle East to introduce universal education for men and women (over 70 years ago). It is now working to reform its education system to meet the economic and social challenges of the 21st century by supporting growth and development, and ultimately, providing greater opportunity for all Bahrainis.

Aimed at educational professionals and public and private sector institutions with an interest in developing new models and standards in education, the Education Project is free to attend.